The role of heavy metal ions in the toxicity of diluted crude oil. In the present study, three different grades of diluted oils are investigated for toxicity toward the brine shrimp Artemia franciscana. This toxicity is due to metal ion release from those oils. The role of these metal ions as well as oil emulsifiers, the fraction soluble in demineralized water, was investigated. The results showed that the toxicity of diluted crude oils is significantly reduced by addition of demineralized water. This was shown to be the result of both lowering the dissolved metal ion concentration in the aqueous phase and the role of oil emulsifiers.
1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method for cleaning up a sealing device for a pipe end of a crude oil transportation pipeline which are exposed to crude oil or produced water and sealing the pipe end by using the pipe end sealing device. The invention also relates to a pipe end sealing device to be used for the crude oil transportation pipeline.
2. Description of Related Art In a crude oil transportation pipeline system that transports crude oil or produced water, leakage occurs in some cases. Once leakage occurs, the leakage becomes an accidental problem and the leakage is not easily detected and corrected. If leakage occurs once, it will spread into the pipe end and gradually the leakage increases in amount. Thus, such an arrangement is provided that if leakage occurs in a portion of the pipeline, it is made possible to seal the portion and to collect leakage materials or surface flow water. A pipe end sealing device of the type as mentioned above for a crude oil transportation pipeline comprises a pipeline joint tool, which can be detachably attached to a pipeline end; a sealing liquid chamber arranged in the pipeline joint tool; a sealing liquid and
