Setting a bit of a challenge for myself over the past week, I've been trying to get my head around the idea of procedural generation, trying to make something that isn't a rather obvious or simple version of that. In this tutorial we'll create a few distinct tileable shapes that will, if you should so desire, allow you to create a number of different maps for your game. One can make a door, a bridge, a wall, or even a battlefield... A: To apply procedural techniques to a game the trick is to start off by setting the rules which generate the structure of the map. So, for example if you wanted to do a battle map like in Might and Magic, you would start with this: Which would generate this: And then, you can use this to help guide your colouring, gradients and texture so it can be a battle map like these: You can also take it a bit further and make it 2d: For more ideas on how to use procedural to generate your maps see here: www.proceduralgeneration.com/how-to-make-maps/ As we work to bring

As the embattled print industry struggles to find a comeback, some publications are choosing to forsake the traditional and go straight to digital. And rather than give up on print altogether, they're putting out new and low-cost editions, focusing on how to make money rather than on brand building. There's big money in low cost editions as the market shifts. According to a recent
